From Facebook's Brian Schwartz and Google are the top two visiting sites in the world, according to Alexa Reviews, a web information service that provides traffic details and related links pages. Chances are you already have a Facebook account or you're being pressured by all your friends and family to join. And if you haven't already, you can sign up for a Google account and get instant access to all their tools. Google accounts have a variety of useful product offerings, including, but not limited to, notifications, Blogspot platform, Calendar, and Gmail. In addition, with your Google account you can eliminate additional login credentials for the social network and enable instant access by following a one-time process through your Facebook account. Sign in to Facebook and click The Account in the navigation menu in the upper-right corner of your screen. Scroll down and click Account Settings. Find the Settings tab in the My Account section. Once this is confirmed, scroll down to where it reports linked accounts, and click Change. Locate the drop-down menu within the Linked Accounts bar. Select Google and press the Sign in button Account. Enter your password when prompted. Click Continue to link your account. From Maude Coffey If you need more than one email account for personal or work reasons, MSN Hotmail allows you to have multiple accounts. You can create a Hotmail account exclusively for e-mail messages related to banking and online shopping, or you may need a secondary email address to keep personal e-mail messages separate from work-related ones. If you ever lose your password or username, the additional account can be a backup to which the password can be sent securely for recovery. Go to the MSN home page, www.msn.com. Click the Hotmail link in the upper-left corner. Click Subscribe to the new window or tab that opens. Fill in the top field your preferred identifier, such as johndoe5. Click the drop-down menu in the next field and select @hotmail.com. Click Check Availability to see if your preferred ID is available. If it's not available, add a different number, a period between your name or the middle original or other combinations until you see a confirmation message that your ID is available. Create a password in the next field and retype the password below it in the next field. The password must be at least six characters long and can be letters or numbers. Make the password difficult for someone to guess. Write down your new username and password and place it in a safe place. Enter the current Hotmail address in the alternate email address field to retrieve a password. You can also create a security question to retrieve a password if preferred. If this is your first Hotmail address, leave this field blank for now. Fill in the requested personal information and captcha box. Read the Microsoft service agreement and privacy statement. After agreeing to the terms and agreeing to receive emails from MSN and affiliates, click Accept. The screen will immediately switch to your new inbox. If this is your first Hotmail address, do these steps again to create an additional account. Account.
